Dracula's castle, in the Carpathian Mountains, near Bistritz (Hungarian Besztercze), an ancient town of Eastern Hungary, in the county of Besztercze-Naszod....

The castle is built on the edge of a terrible precipice. Three sides of it are quite impregnable. The western wing, no longer occupied, is more comfortable than the rest of the building. From its windows a deep valley can be seen, with the great jagged mountains in the distance. The chapel, though in ruins, is quite interesting, as it contains the coffins of Count Dracula and other members of his family. These coffins serve as resting places for the vampires during the daytime and it is not recommended to visit the chapel at night.
